

#288

grass growing in our knuckles borrowing water from blood to build fields for migrant suns flushed from their homes by men that came in the night looking to sew stars into skies they don't belong to Life is an abstraction.

There is no grass in us, but it's not a lie. There are souls that could be fertile dirt.